Marriage Rights & Health? What's the Connection?

In September 2008 the Gay and Lesbian Medical Association's Marriage Equity Initiative published a 16-page document on Same Sex Marriage and Health. That research, combined with news from Iowa and Vermont in recent weeks and the pending decision about marriage rights in California, has helped fuel conversations about same sex marriage in the media, among our friends and family and online.

So, what's the connection between same sex marriage rights and health? There are some important factors to know and think about from GLMAs "Same Sex Marriage and Health," of note, the health and well-being of LGBT people and their families is affected by the right to marry and by the denial of that right:

- ⌘ Access to health insurance through a spouse is an important component of obtaining quality healthcare
- ⌘ Research indicates, at least for heterosexuals, that being married can contribute to overall health and longevity.
- ⌘ Hospital visitation and decision making rights conferred by marriage are important to the quality of care.
- ⌘ Children of LGBT parents benefit when their families are respected and accorded legal protections.

Marriage and Health Report," including citations to published research on this topic at www.glma.org.

Iowa's Supreme Court legalized gay marriage Friday, April 3 in a unanimous decision that makes Iowa the third state to allow same sex couples to wed. The Iowa justices upheld a lower court ruling that rejected a state law restricting marriage to a union between a man and woman. The county attorney who defended the law said he would not seek a rehearing. The only recourse for opponents appeared to be a constitutional amendment, which could take years to ratify.

In their decision, the Supreme Court wrote "If gay and lesbian people must submit to different treatment without an exceedingly persuasive justification, they are deprived of the benefits of the principle of equal protection upon which the rule of law is founded. To decide otherwise", the justices said, "would be an abdication of our constitutional duty."

Ithaca College's Sport, Sexuality and Culture Conference

The Out for Health Program was delighted to place an ad in the conference booklet for Ithaca College's groundbreaking Sport, Sexuality and Culture Conference held this March on the IC campus.

This international gathering of researchers, academics, sports experts, media professionals, students, staff and faculty provided a unique forum for discussing the role and impact of sexuality in sports. Of note, former NBA player, John Amaechi, shared his thoughts on being in the closet as player and coming out after retirement.

From the field,

Family Rejection as a Predictor of Negative Health Outcomes in White and Latino Lesbian, Gay, and Bisexual Young Adults

Young gay and bisexual people whose parents or guardians responded negatively to the news of their sexuality were more likely to attempt suicide, suffer from depression, use illegal drugs and engage in unprotected sex, according to a recent study.

Published in the January issue of Pediatrics, the study was based on a survey of 224 white and Hispanic young adults ages 21-25 who identified themselves as lesbian, gay or bisexual.

OBJECTIVE. We examined specific family rejecting reactions to sexual orientation and gender expression during adolescence as predictors of current health problems in a sample of lesbian, gay, and bisexual young adults.

RESULTS. Higher rates of family rejection were significantly associated with poorer health outcomes. On the basis of odds ratios, lesbian, gay, and bisexual young adults who reported higher levels of family rejection during adolescence were 8.4 times more likely to report having attempted suicide,

5.9 times more likely to report high levels of depression, 3.4 times more likely to use illegal drugs, and 3.4 times more likely to report having engaged in unprotected sexual intercourse compared with peers from families that reported no or low levels of family rejection. Latino men reported the highest number of negative family reactions to their sexual orientation in adolescence.

Providers who serve this population should assess and help educate families about the impact of rejecting behaviors. Counseling families, providing anticipatory guidelines and referring families for counseling and support can help make a critical difference in helping decrease risk and increase well bring for lesbian, gay and bisexual youth.

CONCLUSIONS. This study establishes a clear link between specific parental and caregiver rejecting behaviors and negative health problems in young lesbian, gay, and bisexual adults. Providers who serve this population should assess and help educate families about the impact of rejecting behaviors. Counseling families, providing anticipatory guidelines and referring families for counseling and support can help make a critical difference in helping decrease risk and increase well bring for lesbian, gay and bisexual youth.

The study above is published in the January issue of Pediatrics by researchers from San Francisco State University and the University of Utah.
